

Manners and education when living abroad.

Living abroad is a huge step in anyone's life, however it is something that in my opinion everybody should try at least once in their lifetime because it is such an enhancing experience. On the other hand, when living abroad, to have a culture clash is something that you can expect, but this does not mean that you will have a bad experience. The best thing you can do to avoid that and enjoy your new country is to have good manners. Being polite is the key to success on getting on well with others, which is even more important when living abroad.

One of the best ways to be polite with people from another country is to embrace their way of living and not being afraid of trying new things. As a result of not doing it native people could start thinking that you do not respect their culture. Moreover they could start to look badly at you and putting you apart which is something that you might want to avoid because it is not a good idea to be left apart in a foreign country. To have manners in a foreign country does not only mean to be kind and respectful with others but also to be willing to accept some of their mores.

To live abroad in a successful way you need to open your mind and respect the people from your new country. Try new things until you understand their culture and as a result you will have a better experience that will teach you a new way to see the world.